Those flavors are even more apparent in the house's tete de cuvee, the 1988 Fleur de Champagne. ($80; on sale for $65) With its 50-50 Chardonnay-Pinot Noir blend, this is a very different bottle from its close competitor, Dom Perignon, which is 100 percent white grapes.

There is complexity, richness, nuttiness, toast.

The Fleur bottle is synonymous with Perrier-Jouet these days, but that wasn't always the case.

Although it was designed in 1902 by the Belle Epoque artist Emile Galle it took more than 60 years for the bottle to house any bubbles.

It wasn't until 1969 that Galle's bottle designs, rediscovered in a cellar, were put into production and filled, with the 1964 vintage.

"Now it is one of the three most important tete de cuvees," Fay said: Dom Perignon, Roederer Cristal and Perrier-Jouet Fleur, called La Belle Epoque by the ch.

gues, on a tour last month of his estate. "Pinot Noir and Chardonnay require a cool climate.

"We have a longer growing season than Napa (where many other sparkling wines are made); that was a decision of the company to grow where the grapes grow best."

All grapes used in producing Roederer Estate bottles are grown right there, outside the tiny town of Philo.

In fact, Salgues said, "We have more grapes than we need. We take the cream of the crop."

It isn't the same climate as Champagne, Salgues said; it's the Pacific maritime climate, which is not as cold as Champagne.

It isn't the same soil either: "The soil is opposite to that of Champagne."

But then, Roederer already makes a Champagne; the goal here is to make a high-quality American bubbly.

The Mendocino climate "tends to give a more intense flavor, and a little more color," said the winemaker, who trained in Reims.
