and policy changes you will implement, are the vital first steps to a wholesale shift in current consumption patterns and greenhouse gas discharges. Local decisions are most immediately felt and, more important, assure citizens that government is acting in the best interests of the environment, the economy, and their quality of life. As a longtime participant in the global warming agenda, I know well the difficulty in generating the consensus necessary to address this pressing, though seemingly far-away, concern.

Yours is a laudable commitment and one that must be emulated. While the media and, admittedly, those of us in Washington concentrate on the larger national and international issues surrounding global warming, local initiatives like yours have quietly made substantial contributions. Voluntary participation, especially in these times of great social pressure, proves that the community will and the environmental spirit can provide the foundation for tremendous social action. These measures benefit our Commonwealth, our nation, and the global community.
