How Do Other People Affect Our Lives?

Most people want to be liked and are willing to modify their behavior somewhat to gain the approval of others. This tendency is normal. If we all did exactly as we pleased every moment, we couldn't establish any relationships with other people. However, sometimes people want to be liked so much that they sacrifice what is in their own best interests to gain that approval. How suggestible are you?

Read the following situations. Then write briefly what you would do.

1. It is late on a Saturday afternoon. You went shopping with your mother in the morning, did chores for your dad all afternoon, and now you are tired. You are watching a good TV show and don't want to move until dinner. The doorbell rings, and your best friend and two other classmates walk in and ask you to go with them to the park where a lot of kids meet on Saturdays. You tell them you're tired and hungry for dinner, but they keep insisting that you come along.

How do you feel?

What do you do?

2. Imagine now that instead of your friends at the door, it is your neighbor, four years younger than you and a pest. He or she also wants you to come to the park.

How do you feel?

What do you do?

3. Several months ago, you moved to a new town and started attending a different school. Since then, you have been feeling lonely, watching one group of students, and wishing they would ask you along. Suddenly they ask you to ride home with them. On the way, the driver starts going very fast, dodging oncoming cars, and tailgating. You are beginning to wonder if you'll ever make it home, but you really want these people to like you.

How do you feel?

What do you do?

4. You are riding with two or three people you have known for years and with whom you feel comfortable. Suddenly, the driver's performance begins to frighten you.

How do you feel?

What do you do?
