A journey through the generations

By Carol Galginitis
Mother of two

When I was a kid, my mother ran the household while my father taught physics at a nearby university. We usually spent each summer traveling by car from the Atlantic to the Pacific to spend several weeks with our California relatives.

I remember those long-distance trips with great fondness. I have vivid memories of my three brothers and me devouring a halfgallon of peppermint ice cream by our campfire, knowing it would never survive the night. I also recall combing an empty beach with my father, searching for gorgeous chunks of jade. And I'll never forget one Fourth of July in the Montana Rockies, as I caught my brother by surprise when I landed a snowball squarely on the back of his bare legs.

I am sustained by these childhood images: They define my vision of a loving, caring family. As a result, I have tried very hard to structure my life in such a way that my kids — Jake and Evan — and I can spend the summer together traveling, talking and creating memories.

However, there are many moments when I wonder if it is futile to try to replicate my experiences, if today's families can no longer tolerate the intense closeness that these summers demand.

Such a moment occurred to me this past summer, as the boys and I sat with my mother on a beautiful beach in Monterey, Calif., to view the annual Festival of Lanterns. Several hundred of us were wedged tightly onto a small beach facing the harbor, and I was acutely aware of Evan's elbow in my side, as well as Jake's long legs draped over my lap as we waited for the program to start. Finally, the stage came to life and the dances began. That's when the real trouble started.

"This is totally stupid," Jake said in a loud voice that carried easily over the water. "Why can't we go home?"

"Shhhh," I hissed at him, and suggested that he distract himself by looking at the stars.

What a mistake! Instead of being inspired by the heavens, Jake and Evan began a fierce competition to find the most outrageously scatological description of the clouds as they raced across the sky. The kids grew more raucous by the moment.

I was extremely embarrassed — and very angry. I wanted them to behave themselves and appreciate the beauty of their surroundings.

"Maybe we've been together too long," I thought, shuddering as I contemplated our upcoming month-long trip to Vancouver. "Why do I bother planning these vacations," I asked myself critically. "The kids continually remind me that they'd rather be back at home with their friends. It's a lot of work for me, and maybe I'd be better off concentrating on my career. After all, who's going to take me seriously if I disappear for two months every year?"

I reflected on how peaceful my own childhood trips had been with my mother, father and brothers and wondered where I had gone wrong. As I heard Jake call Evan a jerk, and felt the kick that Evan had intended for his brother, I wondered how I would ever get off that crowded beach without physically maiming my children.

Thankfully, before I landed my first blow, an image popped into my head of a long-forgotten moment from my childhood. I was about 6 years old, and was with my family on our annual sojourn west. We had stopped at a gas station, where I went inside to use the bathroom. When I came out, our car was gone. I stood, confused, for about a minute before I burst into tears. A fellow traveler, an elderly gentleman, asked me what was wrong. When I told him, he took me inside, placed me in a chair and promptly bought me an orange soda. "They'll be right back," he promised me. I wasn't convinced.

Of course, my mother and father did return, probably within a few moments. I remember running into my mother's arms, sobbing, and her saying over and over, "I'm so sorry, honey. I am so, so sorry."

I didn't learn the rest of the story for several days. It seems that my harried parents, traveling for days with four children under 10 years old, had asked if everyone had returned to the car. My older brothers, knowing full well that I was not there, had promptly responded, "Yup, let's get going." It had taken my parents a few moments of drive time to realize that they had been duped.

Now, let me assure you that I love my brothers, and they love me. We talk and visit often. But when I was 6, they didn't really like me. I was much too prissy, too clearly on the side of the adults for their rebellious tastes. They felt I needed to learn a lesson, so they took on the role of life instructor.

Obviously, our relationships back then were far from perfect, despite my now rosy memories and impression that I lived the perfect childhood. I fought with my brothers, declared my hatred for my parents, Intimate relationships of all types are tough to navigate, especially when you expect that the road will be well-paved, marked with reflector tape and carefully graded.

and acted selfish and unconcerned about all of them on a regular basis.

Nevertheless, they hung in there. Each morning, we all gathered around the breakfast table, ready to start another day filled with minor irritations, major disagreements and hurt feelings. Over time, we all learned that the harsh words fade, the anger dissipates, but the commitment to each other remains.

So I will continue our summer-long excursions, despite knowing that several times along the way I will dream longingly of month long sleep-away camp. I hope that some day, Jake and Evan will look back on their night in Monterey under the stars and remember the caress of the summer breeze, the smell of the sea and the warmth of the crowd. But I hope they also realize that those moments of splendor would never have occurred if we hadn't tolerated a little messiness along the way — the messiness that ultimately builds depth, commitment and loyalty. □

Baby Faire

More than 500 babies will compete for the title of fastest crawler in the Baby Derby races at Boston's Biggest Baby Faire to be held April 5 & 6 at the Bayside Expo Center in Boston.

The fifth annual fair features 150 exhibitors with the latest in child care, services and products.

Throughout the weekend, roving cartoon characters and children's performers add an array of creative entertainment for the whole family.

The highlight of the weekend is the hourly races held with babies showing off their fastest crawl. During the Baby Derby heats, 10 babies drool to the finish to then compete for the title.

The fifth annual Boston's Biggest Baby Faire runs Saturday, April 5 and Sunday, April 6, 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Admission is $7 for adults; children are free. A portion of the ticket sales benefit the United Way of Massachusetts Bay's Success By 6 program.

"Now they have a hobby," said

Marshall, who said that not a single boy missed one of the meetings — nor was one ever late.

At a time when youth are often intimidated by policemen, one parent said he watched the program dissolve the wall of misunderstanding and intimidation between Marshall and the boys.

"The kids really like him a lot," said Yutha Amara, whose son was in the program. Amara said the boys now consider the police their friends and talk with Marshall when they see him out in the community. "This is a major, major thing."

Parents, including Amara, have written Commissioner Ronnie Watson to ask that the city continue to pay for the program and start others like it.

"I wish we could do more like this—unfortunately most of the time we come into contact with the kids is in a formal setting," said Marshall, adding that he and the boys now know each other on a first-name basis. His son, Daniel Marshall, also helped with the program. "I don't think these kids will ever get into trouble. They'll never forget me—and I'll never forget them." □

INSIDE SCOOP

Clarification

In the article, "Teacher won't return to Longfellow," (March 25) The TAB incorrectly noted that the Longfellow School principal and assistant principal were out of the district at the same time during the week of March 17. According to Jim Ball, director of public information for the schools, there was no period of time during the aftermath of the taping incident that all three administrators were not present. Mary Eich, assistant principal, was with the eighth-grade class on a student exchange program in Puerto Rico from March 6 to March 13. Margarita Otero-Alvarez, the school's principal, left for a fellowship with the National Hispana Leadership Institute on March 15.

Toomey calls for new city manager

In a surprising move, City Council Timothy J. Toomey Jr. announced last week that he will not support an extension of current City Manager Bob Healy's contract. The City Council was expected to vote on Healy's contract on Monday, March 31.

After completing his evaluation of the city manager and talking with his constituents, Toomey said he found several troubling issues surrounding Healy's administration that have compelled him to seek a new person to lead the city.

Toomey cited the city manager's failure to provide leadership in addressing the city's crisis in housing for its most vulnerable citizens and the manager's refusal to implement the Residency Ordinance that was enacted by the City Council in November 1995. He also criticized several key appointments made by the city manager, including the directors of both the Department of Traffic and Transportation and the city's Personnel Department, as major obstacles to developing a city where its residents are satisfied with their government.

While Toomey acknowledges that the city manager probably has the votes for an extension — only Councilors Ken Reeves and Katherine Triantafyllou have hinted at possible votes against Healy — he "would not and could not" join the majority.

"The city manager has good financial skills, no question," said Toomey, adding that the city manager's administration has become stale, complacent and arrogant. "However, he lacks the leadership and interpersonal skills needed to serve a diverse population like that in Cambridge."

Queer politics conference

Leaders of the 2,300-member Harvard University Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgendered community are hosting a Queer Politics Conference on April 5 from 10:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Eleven panelists will be present at the conference, called "Gay Rights, Equal Rights: Defining the Course of the Gay Rights Movement."

The conference will bring together individuals who have been on the front lines of the battle for queer equality — in Congress, courts, the White House and in electoral and state initiative battles across the country. Speakers will address issues that were played out on the national stage in 1996 and will outline what issues they will concentrate on in the coming years. The conference will offer the opportunity for the leaders of the gay rights movement to define the course that they will take in the next century.

The conference will be held at the ARCO forum, JFK School of Government, Harvard University.

Tolman to hold Cambridge office hours

Senator Warren E. Tolman (D-Watertown) will hold office hours on Thursday, April 3 from noon to 1:30 p.m. in the lounge of the North Cambridge Senior Center, 2050 Massachusetts Ave. Senator Tolman encourages residents to meet with him or a member of his staff to discuss issues, express concerns or seek assistance.

Save the date: anniversary commemoration of the Armenian Genocide

State Senator Warren E. Tolman (D-Watertown) and State Representative Rachel Kaprielian (D-Watertown) are hosting a ceremony commemorating the 82nd anniversary of the Armenian Genocide that will be held on Friday, April 25 at 11 a.m., at the State House, in the Chamber of the House of Representatives. Following the ceremony, a brief service will be held at the Armenian Genocide Plaque and a reception in the Great Hall will be held immediately after the service.

The State House commemoration is an annual event, first initiated by former Speaker of the House George Keverian, as a memorial to the 1.5 million Americans who died from massacre and starvation during the 1915-1923 Armenian Genocide. Each year survivors of the genocide are recognized during the ceremony and provide a remembrance of the tragic events of the earlier part of this century.

Under the Big Top

Women pols ready to take their place

By Leslie Miller
CNC State House Reporter

If you were asked to name a state without a single woman elected to Congress, or the U.S. Senate, or any statewide office for that matter, Massachusetts wouldn't exactly leap to mind. You'd probably think of a right-wing backwater like New Hampshire, since it still doesn't honor Martin Luther King Jr. Day, but no, the Granite State just elected Jeanne Shaheen governor. Or maybe some Southern outback like Georgia, home of the antediluvian Newt Gingrich — but Georgia has actually elected a black woman, Cynthia McKinney Smith, to Congress.

Massachusetts, one of the most liberal states in the union, has never had a woman governor, auditor, treasurer or secretary of state. Never have we sent a woman to the U.S. Senate.

And only twice did we allow a woman into the U.S. House of Representatives: Margaret Heckler, who was beaten by Barney Frank, and, for one brief shining moment, anti-busing activist Louise Day-Hicks.

People who care about these things cite a number of reasons why the distaff side of the political body has done so poorly in Massachusetts. For one thing, politicians have traditionally come up through state politics, and the Massachusetts State House is as wildly sexist as a remote village in a developing country.

"Women have not traditionally been in leadership positions in this state," said Susan Shaer, an Arlington-based political activist. "They've been kept down at the simmering level rather than the boiling level in terms of money."

That, she said, has changed. Women who were in the habit of giving $25 are now writing checks in the same amount as their monthly

Nieman-Marcus credit-card payment.

Former state Rep. Susan Tracy, a Brighton Democrat, thinks that the high-stakes nature of Massachusetts politics has kept female challengers out, and that women have been reluctant to engage in our rock 'em, sock 'em political brawls.

Tracy is just one entry on a lengthening list of ladies thinking about running for a high office in 1998. She's not at all coy about her plans to run for the Eighth District Congressional seat, currently held by Joseph Kennedy who wants to run for governor in 1998. She may be challenged by Dianne Wilkerson, an African-American state senator from Boston. On the Republican side, former Secretary of Consumer Affairs Gloria Larson may also run for Congress or lieutenant governor.

Two Democratic women will probably run for lieutenant governor, too: Lois Pines, a Newton state senator with a war chest that's even bigger than her formidable clothing budget, and Dorothy Kelly Gay, the Somerville executive councilor with a very liberal outlook, especially on women's issues.

Former state Sen. Shannon O'Brien is planning to run for state treasurer a second time, having been beaten badly by Joe Malone in his re-election bid for the post in 1994. Patricia McGovern, former chairman of the Senate Ways and Means committee, will also run for Treasurer. And Sen. Cheryl Jacques (D-Needham) looks like a sure candidate for attorney general.

The women's vote was a deciding factor in the Weld-Kerry race for Senate last year. It's quite possible that 1998 will be a breakthrough year when women candidates are a winning factor. Go, girls, go.

Dispatches

The DSS nightmare

It isn't easy being a Mom. We are the 24-hour-a-day jugglers. We are the household cook, nurse, chef and chauffeur. We pack the lunchboxes and prepare the afternoon snacks. We change the beds and do piles of laundry. We clean the house and rake the yard. For mother who work full- or part-time, the juggling is even more intense.

That's what makes the story of Dr. Bobbi Sweitzer of Sherborn all the more compelling. Sweitzer, you may remember, is the mother who was accused of neglect by the incompetent Department of Social Services. Sweitzer left her two young children in her parked car last July while she quickly ran into Sam's Club in Natick to drop off some film. The car was locked and alarmed with a window cracked open.

Sweitzer says she went into the glass entryway of the store and that her children — ages 1 and 4 — were out of her view no more than 20-30 seconds.

It is something nearly all of us have done at one time or another. This time, a passerby noticed the children and alerted the Natick Police Department. What followed was a nightmare. Without ever interviewing Sweitzer or her children, the DSS filed a neglect charge against Sweitzer.

What's worse, DSS later admitted to falsifying documents — by claiming to have conducted the required interviews. Sweitzer found out about the neglect charge when she received a complaint from DSS in the mail that said the charge was being filed "after visiting with you and your children and talking to other people who know your family."

Sweitzer was shocked. She contacted the head of the Framingham DSS office, Freda London, who she says told her she was a neglectful parent. Sweitzer says she asked London if it would be neglectful to step outside her car to pump gas with her children inside. London's response was "yes," it would be neglect, according to Sweitzer.

Sweitzer realized she was sinking in a bureaucratic nightmare and had to defend herself. She asked DSS for a hearing and was told she would have to wait six months. She hired an attorney and a psychiatrist to evaluate her and her children at a cost of $15,000.

At this point, says Sweitzer, she was beginning "to doubt myself as a mother." In January Sweitzer finally got her hearing — and was told to wait another two months for a decision. Sweitzer had to find out from news reporters that DSS decided to reverse the neglect charge on March 21. As of March 28, neither she nor her attorney had been officially notified of the DSS findings. Phone calls to DSS went unreturned.

But the story doesn't end there. Even though Sweitzer has been found innocent, the "unsupported" charge of child neglect will remain on her record for an entire year. Why? "Because it's state law," says DSS spokesperson Lorraine Carli.

Let me get this straight. An innocent woman is accused of child neglect. The social worker files a false report that she's done a complete investigation. DSS finds the accused guilty

Perspective

Beware censorware

By James D'Entremont

According to the National Commission on Libraries and Information Sciences, the rapidly expanding number of U.S. public libraries offering Internet access may now exceed 50 percent. As more and more information is stored electronically — and in some cases only exists on-line — computers will become as basic to library services as sets of reference books. Attempts to control information on the Internet are concurrently increasing, as are steps to reduce the availability of that information.

Boston is in the vanguard of communities hastening to limit citizens' access to cyberspace. On February 11, City Councilor Maureen Feeney announced to the press that "concerned parents" claimed their children had viewed "pornography" on computers at the Boston Public Library. Mayor Thomas M. Menino soon issued a directive to the library system to install filtering software in all computers. The Library Board of Trustees rubber-stamped the mayor's order at once. The following day, the city spent $2500 on site licenses for Cyber Patrol, a filtering system capable of blocking Internet sites deemed offensive.

The American Library Association confirms that Menino's edict was the first of its kind from an American mayor. If Boston implements this order, other city governments will follow suit without pausing to think. To the gullible, cleaning up the Internet seems a simple matter of installing software.

Pursuing a marketing strategy of scaring the uninformed, then offering a panacea, censorware products like Net Nanny and CyberSitter now compete with one another in a moral-vigilante sweepstakes. Filtering software has recently been installed in library computers in Austin, Orlando, and other communities.

The notion that it's possible to press a button and purge cyberspace of Demon Smut is as much a fantasy as the myth that six-year-olds can instantly access outie obscenities (or would want to). There is, in fact, no existing software that recognizes "dirty pictures." Only human beings can evaluate content. Censorware seeks out strings of characters, not hardcore sexual depictions. Like its rivals, Cyber Patrol works erratically. Central to its methods is a secret "CyberNOT" list updated weekly, enabling Cyber Patrol to blacklist sites on a whim while covering embarrassments as fast as its critics expose them.

Parents — or city officials acting in loco parentis — can close off sites under categories set by Cyber Patrol, or pick their own sites to block. (To maintain its own blacklist, a library system would need a panel of experts surfing the vast and ever-changing Web full time.) Sites blocked by Cyber Patrol for "extremism" include the city of Hiroshima's Web page dealing with plans for a Peace Memorial. Sites blocked for sexual content include papers on HIV from the American Medical Association; articles in the Village Voice and Z Magazine; gay and feminist political sites; and the home page of Planned Parenthood.

In the words of William O. Douglas, "Free speech is not to be regulated like diseased cattle or impure butter." Whatever Menino's intentions, his library directive shows a troubling obliviousness to the First Amendment implications of public officials handing censorship powers to a private corporation. It also betrays an ignorance of Massachusetts law, which states that libraries "shall establish a written policy ... in accordance with standards adopted by the American Library Association" — standards that are utterly opposed to censorship.

The arbiters of what children can see or read must be their parents. Bernard Margolis, who took office as president of the BPL during this controversy, has proposed that parental permission be the key element in any system of restricted access for children. Such a system must take into account legal precedents concerning material "harmful to minors," and await the final disposition of the Communications Decency Act. To use censorware instead is to abrogate the rights of both adults and minors through the legitimization of snake oil.

James D'Entremont is a playwright and director of the Boston Coalition for Freedom of Expression. The BCFE's Web site (<http://world.std.com/~kip/bcfe.html>) is blocked by Cyber Patrol.

— but never visits the family or interviews the mother to see if the kids are OK. A hearing is held. The woman is exonerated but nobody from DSS bothers to tell her. And now she has a record that she has been accused of child neglect.

Last week a red-faced DSS admitted that social workers have filed false documents in other so-called "investigations" too. But Carli denies that her agency is either understaffed or overworked. In fact she had no explanation other than to say it was "unfortunate."

It's more than unfortunate. It's sloppy, careless and uncaring. DSS is an agency more concerned with paperwork than the welfare of children it seems unable to protect.

The anonymous man who first reported the Sweitzer incident to the police did the right thing. The children in the car were very young, no parent was in sight and it was a very hot day. It is just that kind of concern from a stranger that can save a child's life. The police were right to investigate it. But this case should have never gone to DSS.

Parents will argue whether it's prudent to ever leave a child alone in a car. The answer comes down to what's reasonable. I have left my children in the car when I run into a glass-enclosed

ATM machine I can park right next to. But even if my 6-year-old pleads with me to leave her in the car while I run into the grocery store, I won't do it — not if I can't see her.

The problem with the Sweitzer incident is that it makes us all feel guilty. A mother who left her two young children in the car was made to feel like a criminal by a bumbling agency that should have been abolished and replaced with something far more efficient years ago.
