Lead:

GREENEVILLE, Tenn. -- A former chief of naval operations who blamed his son's death on exposure to Agent Orange in the Vietnam War testified yesterday that the paper industry is trying to hide the hazards of dioxin.

Retired Admiral Elmo Zumwalt testified in the trial of 2,600 Tennessee property owners who are seeking nearly $368 million in punitive damages against Champion International for allegedly polluting the Pigeon River and Douglas Lake.

Text:

Champion says the landowners have not proved their property, downstream of its paper mill at Canton, N.C., was damaged.

As the trial entered its second week, Zumwalt testified that Champion and other paper makers have tried to deny their pollution is harmful and stall attempts to make them clean up their pollution. "I consider that their conduct has been not only unethical but reprehensible."

Zumwalt blames his son's 1988 death on exposure to Agent Orange, which contained dioxin, the cancer-causing chemical that Champion discharged into Pigeon Lake. He has done extensive research on dioxin.

Dioxin is a waste product of the paper-making process, created when bleaches and organic compounds mix.

Zumwalt said members of the American Paper Institute, an industry group for paper makers, conspired to deny their contamination is dangerous.

"Champion has known for many years that they were polluting the river," he said.

Zumwalt, who was chief of naval operations during the Vietnam War, testified in the class-action lawsuit in US District Court as an expert on corporate governance and government regulations.
