Innovative Saint Louis Symphony a bit uneven, but saves the best for last

Reprinted from late editions of yesterday's Globe.

By Richard Dyer
GLOBE STAFF

There was a time 15 years ago when the orchestral concerts presented in the BankBoston Celebrity

Music Review Series attracted a large public disaffected by the BSO, which was in a slump. Since then our resident orchestra has come out of the slump, and in a week that held Bernard Haitink in a once-in-a-lifetime performance of Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," it was hard to get the point of a concert like the one Friday night by the Saint Louis Symphony and Hans Vonk, which could not put either the orchestra's or the conductor's best foot forward.

A few years ago a national magazine created quite a stir by proclaiming the Saint Louis Symphony the best orchestra in the land. It wasn't true then, and it isn't true now, but at the time, Leonard Slatkin's orchestra was doing some of the most interesting and adventurous work in America. The last time this listener heard the orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, Slatkin led a wonderful performance of William Bolcom's great oratorio, "Songs of Innocence and Experience," and its most recent important recording was an alternate realization of Mahler's incomplete 10th Symphony.

Overall, the best qualities of the orchestra emerge in discipline, spirit, and ensemble virtues.

Vonk, the orchestra's music director since 1996, has apparently continued the tradition of innovation. New York audiences earlier this week were favored with John Harbison's First Symphony, premiered by the Boston Symphony in 1984 and unheard here since. But BankBoston Celebrity Series decided our public would rather hear Andre Watts in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto — although just two weeks ago we heard Radu Lupu and the BSO under Haitink in four performances of this work.

With the best will in the world it was impossible to hear the Saint Louis performance as competitive, even though Lupu had pulled a muscle in his back and wasn't at his best. The orchestra was too big and too loud, and the woodwind playing in the slow movement was out of tune. Watts is an underrated pianist because he and his advisers are their own worst enemies; he is mostly heard in the same handful of works. As a result, Watts has become interesting in inverse proportion to how often he has repeated a piece over the last 35 years. He has played the "Emperor" Concerto a lot; Friday night he was in erratic form and seemed to be toying with the music instead of playing it.

Vonk, whose last appearance here was in 1982 with the Hague Philharmonic, proved an able, resourceful, and experienced accompanist who came into his own with a solid, traditional, well-planned, tasteful, and sometimes exciting performance of the Brahms First Symphony.

The Saint Louis Orchestra is a predominantly young band that could give lessons in diversity to some other ensembles; goals of diversity can be achieved without artistic compromise. The principal oboist plays in tune and the principal horn beats the odds by being thoroughly reliable; in tuning and attack the trombone chorale in the finale was superior to many others one has heard. The concertmaster's solo at the end of the second movement, on the other hand, was unsettled, perhaps by nerves, and certainly by excessive vibrato.

Overall, the best qualities of the orchestra emerge in discipline, spirit, and ensemble virtues — these musicians play on the edge of their seats, and they make you want to listen that way. Perhaps the most successful performance of the evening came at encore time, when everyone really tore into a barn-burning performance of one of Brahms's Hungarian Dances.

Musica Viva goes electronic, with engaging and sometimes hilarious results

Reprinted from late editions of yesterday's Globe.

By Susan Larson
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A whole concert of electronic music, "Synthesizers, samples and other creatures that go beep in the night," doesn't seem as unpalatable as it once did.

Music Review We are all so used to computer-generated sounds in pop, rap, and the movies that the products of Milton Babbitt, John Cage, and Mario Davidovsky seem almost quaint. Musica Viva music director Richard Pittman, a self-confessed technologically challenged musician, put together a marvelous program of old and new electronic music and, as always, a crackerjack ensemble to play along with it.

Davidovsky, renowned for his compositions with live performers and taped sound, was represented by two of his "Synchronisms," the first a nerve-rackingly difficult exercise for strings, winds, and a tape track that sounded for all the world like R2-D2 having a tantrum. The second, for tape and solo violin, celebrates the exhibitionist, Paganini-esque side of the instrument. Violinist Bayla Keyes knows how to make the grand gesture; swooping, skittering, pouncing on the music, she was so riveting she upstaged the tape rather badly.

Milton Babbitt's "Phonemena," a tightly controlled serial piece for soprano and tape, got a sizzling performance from soprano Judith Bettina, who managed to make her disjunct vocal line and nonsense syllables into a playful, loose-limbed, improvisatory thing, somewhere between a bel canto cadenza and scat-singing. After intermission she did the piece again, just to prove she wasn't making it all up.

John Cage's "Credo in US," his piece for choreographer Merce Cunningham, qualifies as electronic music because it uses a phonograph (or a radio if you prefer), as well as 10 tin cans, an electric buzzer, muted gongs, and stifled piano. The phonograph played Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which faded in and out of a riot of Afro-Cuban rhythms from the terrific percussionists Dean Anderson and Robert Schulz, and wiggled-out piano playing by Vytas Baksys. It was more than engaging, it was hilarious; it's always wonderful to see performers smiling and hear the audience laughing.

Boston composer Eric Chasalow provided the evening's premiere piece, "Portrait of the Artist," using bits and pieces of John Lennon's words and Beatles music, all immediately identifiable, and so evocative of that era that it probably gave some audience members a terrible case of the munchies. Charles Dodge monkeyed around with an acoustic Caruso recording of Leonecavallo's "Vesti la Giubba," deconstructing and retooling it as a duet for tape and piano. Baksys entered into the playfulness with just the right emotional extravagance, which betrayed not a hint of mockery or condescension.

Pittman and the ensemble closed with Boston composer Peter Child's brilliant "Ensemblance," a staple of Musica Viva repertoire. Child used electronic sound to mimic live instruments, leaving the audience to ponder just who or what is playing. Surging rip-tides of gestures swirled and rebounded off one another in linear, rhetorical episodes; wonderful colors shifted from performers to tape and back again. Dean Anderson's stunning, almost balletic star turn on percussion was matched by Baksys' thunderous pronouncements and rippling cadenzas on the piano. Here was serious music-making that could enlighten and amuse.

Ballet Hispanico dancers explore a range of Latin rhythms and moods

Reprinted from late editions of yesterday's Globe.

By Elijah Wald
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Ballet Hispanico, which began a three-day run at the Emerson Friday night, is a sort of Latino counterpart to Alvin Ailey: a group that draws on and celebrates an ethnic tradition, but is not limited by it. Dazzlingly varied and spectacularly executed, the opening performance was a pleasure from beginning to end.

The program comprised three pieces, running the gamut from a mock apotheosis of the Tejana pop star Selena to a dark evocation of the New York poems of Federico Garcia Lorca, to "Ritmo y Ruido (Rhythm and Noise)" an abstract piece that exuberantly lived up to its name. (It is the only one to be repeated in this program; all three will be performed this afternoon. For tickets, telephone 617-824-8000.)

The opener, "Idol Obsession," perfectly captured the Madonna (as in Mary)/Madonna (as in Ciccone) dichotomy of Selena worship, one of the decade's oddest cultural developments. Lisa Nafegar, as Selena, had just the right blend of innocence and kitsch. She was leggy and coltish as she emerged from the virginal white dress of the opening scene into the rhinestone bustier of her pop career.

Her wide-eyed yen for stardom evoked Gene Kelly's "Gotta Dance," number from "Singin' in the Rain," updated and given a Tex-Mex disco soundtrack.

The costumes and choreography were equally apropos, from a gaudy Virgin of Guadalupe to a stageful of Latin showbiz stereotypes: Carmen Miranda, a mariachi player, a bull-fighter.

Veronica Ruiz, who distinguished herself throughout the evening with her lithe grace and sure theatrical sense, provided a soulful balance to Nafegar's perky lead. As Yolanda, she was the star's support, alter ego, and finally assassin. (Selena returned from the grave for a truly odd dance with Death and the Virgin.)

The pained lyricism of the second piece, "Poema Infinito," seemed almost to come from another dance company. Inspired by Lorca's stay in New York, this jarringly juxtaposed his Spanish classicism with the mechanical rhythms of the modern city, the soundtrack alternating flamenco guitar with ticking snare drums.

Framed with poetic solos by Pedro Ruiz, it reached its pinnacle when four women dancers who strained to break out into free motion were dragged back into a sort of jerky clockwork.

"Ritmo y Ruido" attempted no message. It simply exulted in the possibilities of dance. Ann Reinking's choreography contrasted sinuous sexiness with inhuman angularity, smooth curves with hyperactive bounces. Its centerpiece was a pas de deux by Alessandra Corona and Chad Bantner that fascinatingly explored the range of interactions that two bodies can manage.

The rest of the piece was a constantly shifting barrage of solos, pairings, and meticulously executed ensemble moves, with wry nods to burlesque exoticism and Latin street dance. It managed just the right combination of grace, humor, and athleticism, always pulling back before crossing the boundary into empty flash.

By the time it came to its twirling, running, jumping finish, the crowd was breathless and the standing ovation was a foregone conclusion.
