Salvadoran sister city excluded from national elections

BY AMY MILLER
Chronicle Staff

Cambridge's sister city in El Salvador is one of a handful of towns excluded from that nation's elections Sunday, raising concerns about fairness in the country's first vote since the 1992 peace accords.

Salvadoran election authorities determined last week that San Jose Las Flores and two other towns in the province of Chalatenango had inadequate voting conditions, according to a story in the New York Times. As a result, residents of San Jose and the other two towns where leftist guerrillas were able to resist government forces during the 12-year civil war were forced to travel an hour to the capital of the province to vote.

A delegation of Cambridge residents is in El Salvador this week viewing elections, and is expected to report back on the event in Cambridge. The group includes David Grosser, coordinator of the San Jose Las Flores sister city committee.

Just days before the election, Rep. Joseph Kennedy (D-Mass.) and several other members of Congress sent a letter to the United Nations ambassador expressing a number of areas of concern in Sunday's elections. Among the list of items, Kennedy mentioned that in San Jose Las Flores, large numbers of soldiers have been added to the voting rolls.

The letter also noted that 100,000 people did not receive voting cards and won't be able to vote, that voters have been removed from registries in their home towns and listed elsewhere, and that 600,000 blank ballots were destroyed.

Residents of San Jose and two other towns were forced to travel an hour to the capital of the province to vote.

In addition, army helicopters transporting ballots and a National Police force that was supposed to be demobilized by now under the UN peace accords, but is monitoring elections, add fear and pressure. The letter sent to Madeleine K. Albright, US ambassador to the United Nations, was signed by about 40 members of Congress, including representatives Joseph Moakley, Barney Frank, Gerry Studds and Edward Markey, all of Massachusetts.

The towns denied voting privileges, including Las Flores, gave strong support to the left-leaning Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMNLF) during the civil war. The decision to ban these towns was made by the Supreme Electoral Tribunal, an organization heavily influenced by groups that held power in the past.

UN officials opposed the decision of the tribunal, saying it violated acceptable procedures.

After 2 million people cast votes Sunday, the country's right-leaning governing party, Arena, had apparently won the election. Arena gained nearly twice the votes of the Democratic Convergence, the coalition that includes the FMNLF.

Leading presidential candidate Armando Calderon Sol had 49 percent of the vote as of early this week, indicating a run-off election would be necessary April 24 against the left's candidate, Ruben Zamora.

The election brought a 54 percent turnout in a country where about half the nation's 5.5 million people are eligible to vote. This was roughly the same number that voted in elections a decade ago during the height of the civil war violence.

EARTH NOTES

Book drive and slide lecture focus on Zimbabwe sister

The Cambridge-Bulawayo Sister City Committee will be collecting children's books and National Geographic magazines (1980-present) through the Cambridge Public Library and its branches to help young Zimbabweans learn about science. Books and magazines must be in good condition.

These hard-to-get magazines and books represent Cambridge's first public education drive for Zimbabwean youth.

When a first Cambridge delegation leaves for Bulawayo (planned for May by the Sister City Committee), publicly donated books and other gifts will accompany them. Official sister city accords are hoped for at that time. For more information about the book drive, call the Cambridge Public Library.

Often the best location for a workbench is against a wall, because rigidity is important... Besides sturdy construction, the rear legs of the bench can be anchored to wall studs with lag screws... A heavy machinist's vise may be located at the right end of the bench, as you face it, but a woodworker's vise goes at the left end, particularly for convenience in planing by hand... Perhaps you will want both... To save steps, a panel for hand tools should be close to the bench... A convenient, narrow tool cabinet is good...

Salvadoran sister city excluded from national elections

BY AMY MILLER
Chronicle Staff

Cambridge's sister city in El Salvador is one of a handful of towns excluded from that nation's elections Sunday, raising concerns about fairness in the country's first vote since the 1992 peace accords.

Salvadoran election authorities determined last week that San Jose Las Flores and two other towns in the province of Chalatenango had inadequate voting conditions, according to a story in the New York Times. As a result, residents of San Jose and the other two towns where leftist guerrillas were able to resist government forces during the 12-year civil war were forced to travel an hour to the capital of the province to vote.

A delegation of Cambridge residents is in El Salvador this week viewing elections, and is expected to report back on the event in Cambridge. The group includes David Grosser, coordinator of the San Jose Las Flores sister city committee.

Just days before the election, Rep. Joseph Kennedy (D-Mass.) and several other members of Congress sent a letter to the United Nations ambassador expressing a number of areas of concern in Sunday's elections. Among the list of items, Kennedy mentioned that in San Jose Las Flores, large numbers of soldiers have been added to the voting rolls.

The letter also noted that 100,000 people did not receive voting cards and won't be able to vote, that voters have been removed from registries in their home towns and listed elsewhere, and that 600,000 blank ballots were destroyed.

Residents of San Jose and two other towns were forced to travel an hour to the capital of the province to vote.

In addition, army helicopters transporting ballots and a National Police force that was supposed to be demobilized by now under the UN peace accords, but is monitoring elections, add fear and pressure. The letter sent to Madeleine K. Albright, US ambassador to the United Nations, was signed by about 40 members of Congress, including representatives Joseph Moakley, Barney Frank, Gerry Studds and Edward Markey, all of Massachusetts.

The towns denied voting privileges, including Las Flores, gave strong support to the left-leaning Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMNLF) during the civil war. The decision to ban these towns was made by the Supreme Electoral Tribunal, an organization heavily influenced by groups that held power in the past.

UN officials opposed the decision of the tribunal, saying it violated acceptable procedures.

After 2 million people cast votes Sunday, the country's right-leaning governing party, Arena, had apparently won the election. Arena gained nearly twice the votes of the Democratic Convergence, the coalition that includes the FMNLF.

Leading presidential candidate Armando Calderon Sol had 49 percent of the vote as of early this week, indicating a run-off election would be necessary April 24 against the left's candidate, Ruben Zamora.

The election brought a 54 percent turnout in a country where about half the nation's 5.5 million people are eligible to vote. This was roughly the same number that voted in elections a decade ago during the height of the civil war violence.

EARTH NOTES

Book drive and slide lecture focus on Zimbabwe sister

The Cambridge-Bulawayo Sister City Committee will be collecting children's books and National Geographic magazines (1980-present) through the Cambridge Public Library and its branches to help young Zimbabweans learn about science. Books and magazines must be in good condition.

These hard-to-get magazines and books represent Cambridge's first public education drive for Zimbabwean youth.

When a first Cambridge delegation leaves for Bulawayo (planned for May by the Sister City Committee), publicly donated books and other gifts will accompany them. Official sister city accords are hoped for at that time. For more information about the book drive, call the Cambridge Public Library.

Often the best location for a workbench is against a wall, because rigidity is important... Besides sturdy construction, the rear legs of the bench can be anchored to wall studs with lag screws... A heavy machinist's vise may be located at the right end of the bench, as you face it, but a woodworker's vise goes at the left end, particularly for convenience in planing by hand... Perhaps you will want both... To save steps, a panel for hand tools should be close to the bench... A convenient, narrow tool cabinet is good...

Local artist depicts interplay between nature and people

Leslie's European trip focused on cranes, big picture

BY AMY MILLER
Chronicle Staff

Most of the artists in southern Spain focused on the migratory birds around them, crafting technically accurate drawings of the European cranes or looser sketches of the continent's biggest bird.

But Clare Walker Leslie of Garfield Street included the almond and olive trees, the big sky, even the farmers and old stone walls as part of the wildlife scenes that she painted. To Leslie, environmental educator and urban naturalist, these parts of the environment were as important to the picture as the birds themselves.

In fact, Leslie's own reactions to the birds' habitat is also integral to her artwork, combining names, dates, people and memories, as well as sketches and paintings in her artistic journal. Known internationally for artwork that comes in a journal, Leslie was one of 20 artists invited last month on an all-expense-paid trip to the Extremadura region of Spain. There she took part in the conservation efforts of the Artists for Nature Foundation, a 3-year-old group founded in Holland to focus attention on the world's threatened habitats.

During her 10 days in this sparsely populated region, Leslie painted and sketched the world she saw around her, including other artists, children, bulls, horizons, ducks, trees and of course the cranes that were the focus of the journey.

Entering 16th century Spain, the Artists for Nature Foundation hoped to show how European cranes that migrate from Scandinavia to the Iberian Peninsula depend on the Extremadura region for their survival. Paintings and drawings of these migratory birds done by Leslie and the other artists will be on exhibit in Europe and then the United States, and later will be included in a book that will be sold to raise money for conservation efforts.

Leslie, a 47-year-old mother of two, plans to take her work on the road here in the US and tell other artists and environmentalists about the threats to the crane and habitat in southern Spain. Just as she has done for more than two decades with children, nature lovers and adults artists, Leslie will show how art and nature can work together by taking out a journal she made in Spain, in addition to the 15 water color paintings and pen and ink drawings.

Just as journals in the past have shown the ecosystem of Mt. Auburn Cemetery, New England environments and regions of the country where she has taught, a small black sketch book she made in Spain is filled with images and notes that describe different pieces of the puzzle in that fragile agricultural habitat.

Youth that Leslie sketched sledding on grass in Extremadura, for instance, represent the generation likely to move from this area. As younger citizens leave the farms, the tentative balance of this arid region is threatened. And the goats, pigs, cranes and bulls she drew depend on the oak trees for shade, while the old stone walls are as much a part of the history and ecology of the region as the snow-capped mountains and small traditional farms.

Leslie, who teaches at the Cambridge Center for Adult Education, Harvard's Museum of Comparative Zoology, and the Mass. College of Art, will talk about her trip in an April 5 meeting of the Cambridge Garden Club.

In teaching and lectures, Walker encourages artists and nature lovers to combine their thoughts and observations through both word and image. It is a technique she has used teaching in Cambridge Public Schools and that she describes in several of her published books, including "Nature Drawing: A Tool for Learning," "Nature All Year Long" and "The Art of Field Sketching."

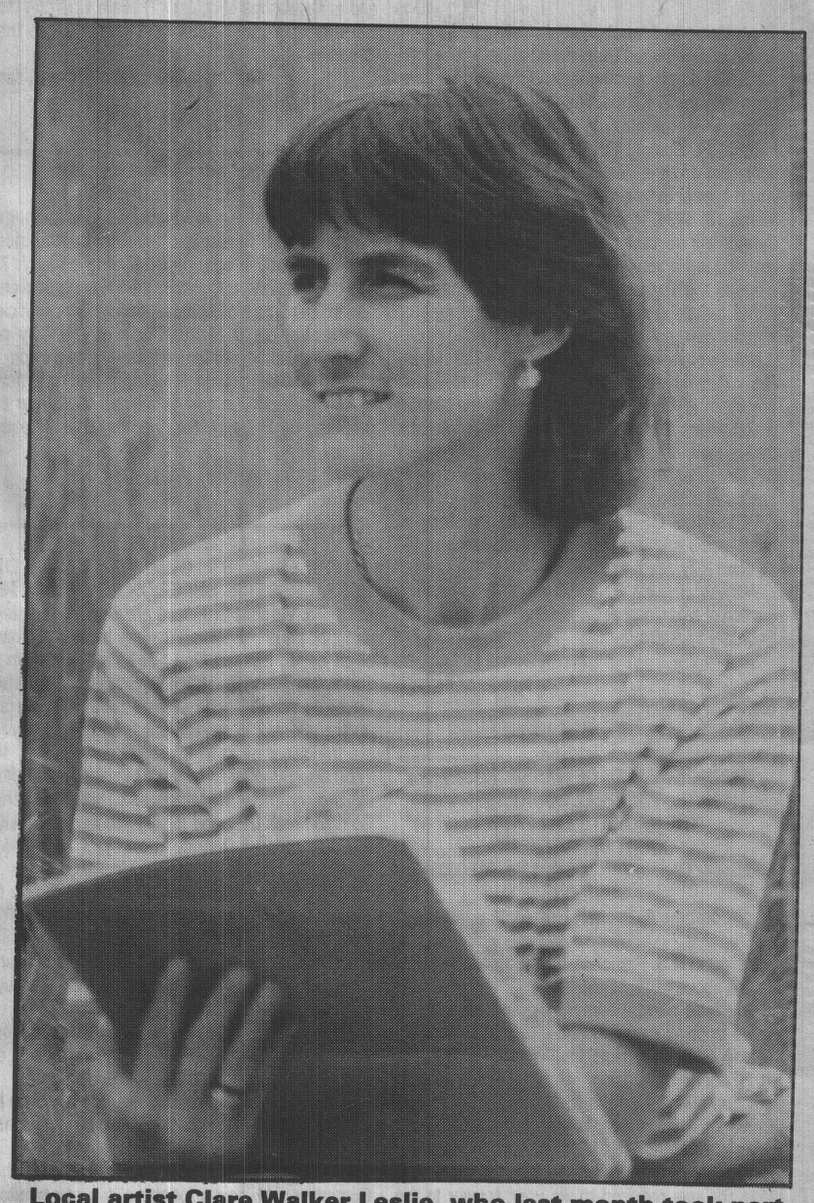

For Leslie, getting every feather and claw perfect is less important than documenting the interplay between nature and people. She wants her students to observe more keenly, becoming closer to the world around then. A part-time resident of Granville in Central Vermont, she is attached to the wildlife in cities as much as in the country.

The Artists for Nature Foundation has already published two books meant to draw attention to threatened areas worldwide and to raise money for conservation. "Wind, Wad & Waterverf" focused on the Dutch barrier island of Schiermonikoog and "Portrait of a Living Marsh" brought attention to the Bierbrza marsh area in eastern Poland.

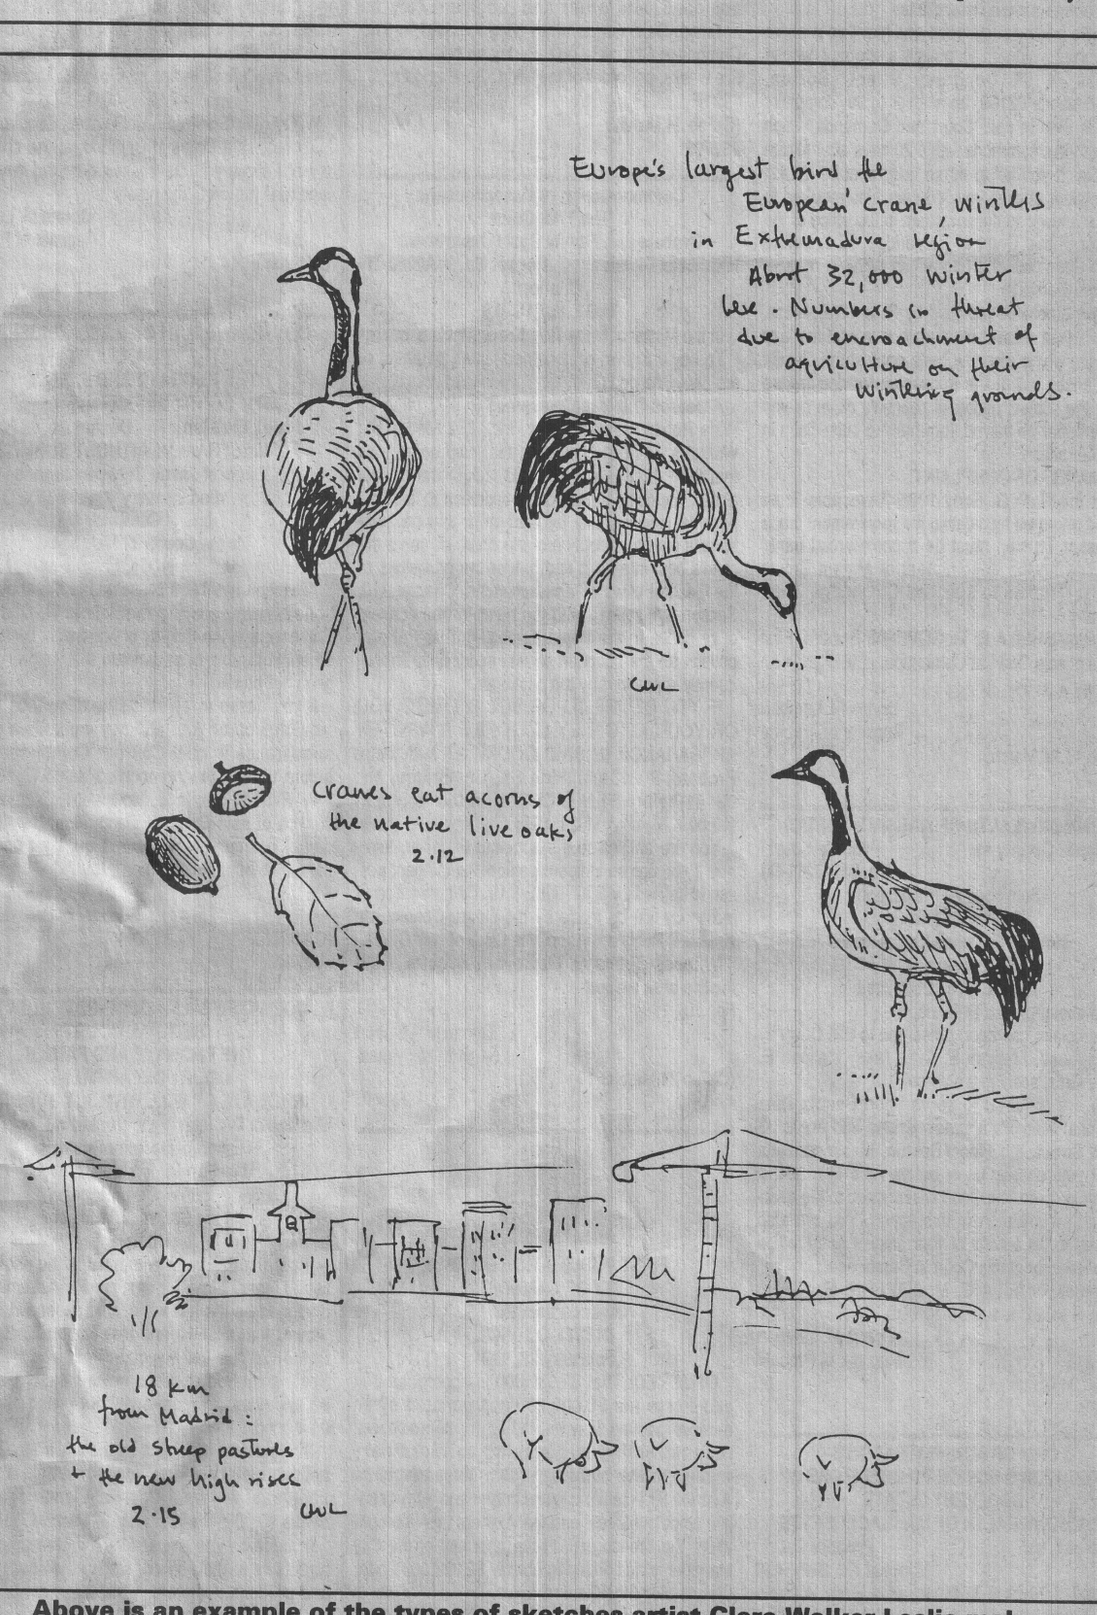

The foundation decided to follow the cranes because of their migratory habits that leave them depending on the habitats of many countries for survival. About 50,000 European cranes with wing spans of nearly 1.5 meters fly the 2,500 kilometers to Spain each year, moving through the Baltic states and from Poland across Germany and France to the Iberian peninsula where Extremadura is home for the winter.

During her own stay, Leslie combined her interest in the environment with a career challenge to produce some of her best work in water color, as well as pen and ink.

"It was very exciting for me professionally because the other artists are the best in their country," said Leslie. "They're nationally recognized so I had to produce my best."

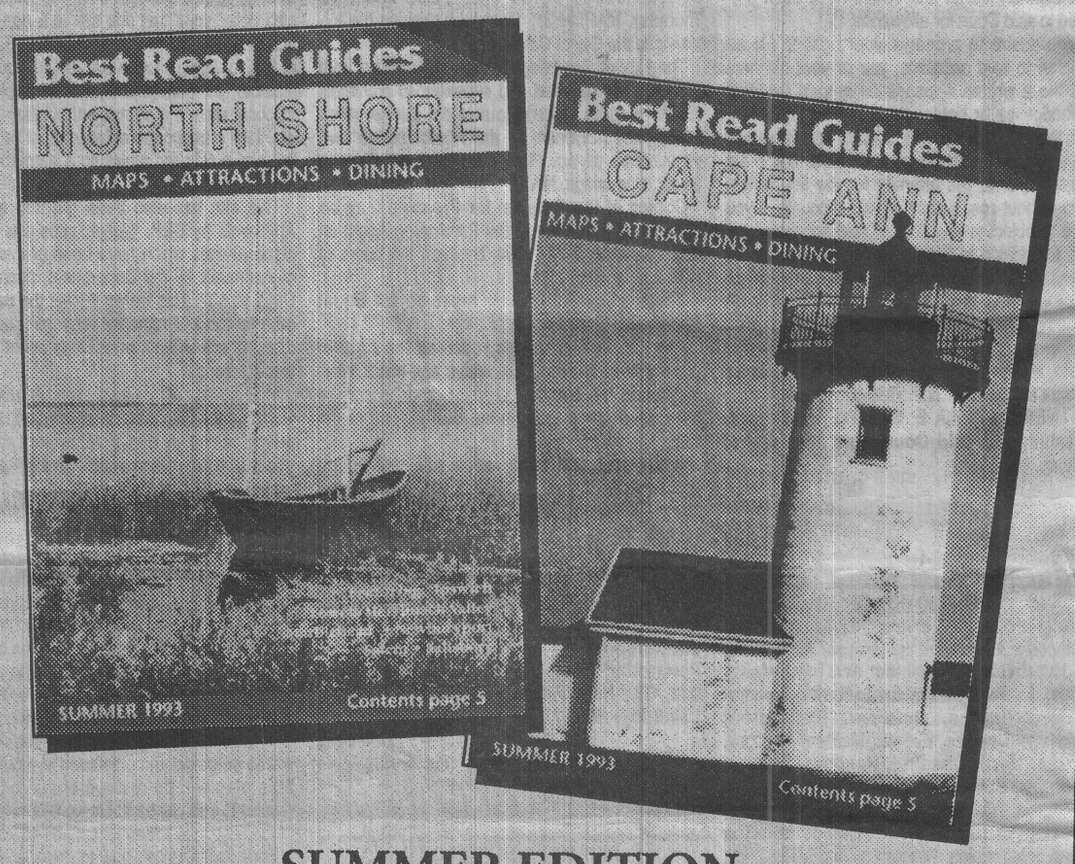

Local artist Clare Walker Leslie, who last month took part in an Artists for Nature Foundation trip to the Extremadura region of Spain, likes to be very aware of the interplay between nature and people.

Local artist depicts interplay between nature and people

Leslie's European trip focused on cranes, big picture

BY AMY MILLER
Chronicle Staff

Most of the artists in southern Spain focused on the migratory birds around them, crafting technically accurate drawings of the European cranes or looser sketches of the continent's biggest bird.

But Clare Walker Leslie of Garfield Street included the almond and olive trees, the big sky, even the farmers and old stone walls as part of the wildlife scenes that she painted. To Leslie, environmental educator and urban naturalist, these parts of the environment were as important to the picture as the birds themselves.

In fact, Leslie's own reactions to the birds' habitat is also integral to her artwork, combining names, dates, people and memories, as well as sketches and paintings in her artistic journal. Known internationally for artwork that comes in a journal, Leslie was one of 20 artists invited last month on an all-expense-paid trip to the Extremadura region of Spain. There she took part in the conservation efforts of the Artists for Nature Foundation, a 3-year-old group founded in Holland to focus attention on the world's threatened habitats.

During her 10 days in this sparsely populated region, Leslie painted and sketched the world she saw around her, including other artists, children, bulls, horizons, ducks, trees and of course the cranes that were the focus of the journey.

Entering 16th century Spain, the Artists for Nature Foundation hoped to show how European cranes that migrate from Scandinavia to the Iberian Peninsula depend on the Extremadura region for their survival. Paintings and drawings of these migratory birds done by Leslie and the other artists will be on exhibit in Europe and then the United States, and later will be included in a book that will be sold to raise money for conservation efforts.

Leslie, a 47-year-old mother of two, plans to take her work on the road here in the US and tell other artists and environmentalists about the threats to the crane and habitat in southern Spain. Just as she has done for more than two decades with children, nature lovers and adults artists, Leslie will show how art and nature can work together by taking out a journal she made in Spain, in addition to the 15 water color paintings and pen and ink drawings.

Just as journals in the past have shown the ecosystem of Mt. Auburn Cemetery, New England environments and regions of the country where she has taught, a small black sketch book she made in Spain is filled with images and notes that describe different pieces of the puzzle in that fragile agricultural habitat.

Youth that Leslie sketched sledding on grass in Extremadura, for instance, represent the generation likely to move from this area. As younger citizens leave the farms, the tentative balance of this arid region is threatened. And the goats, pigs, cranes and bulls she drew depend on the oak trees for shade, while the old stone walls are as much a part of the history and ecology of the region as the snow-capped mountains and small traditional farms.

Leslie, who teaches at the Cambridge Center for Adult Education, Harvard's Museum of Comparative Zoology, and the Mass. College of Art, will talk about her trip in an April 5 meeting of the Cambridge Garden Club.

In teaching and lectures, Walker encourages artists and nature lovers to combine their thoughts and observations through both word and image. It is a technique she has used teaching in Cambridge Public Schools and that she describes in several of her published books, including "Nature Drawing: A Tool for Learning," "Nature All Year Long" and "The Art of Field Sketching."

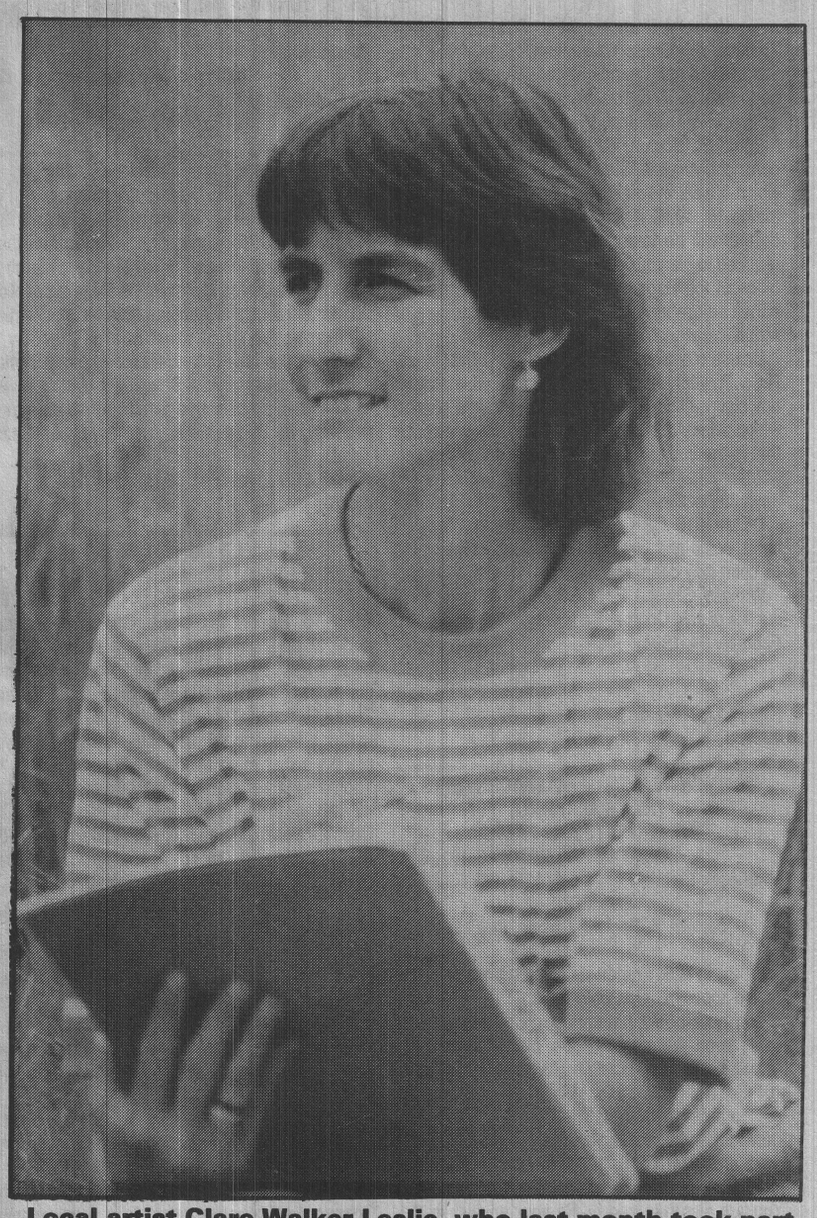

For Leslie, getting every feather and claw perfect is less important than documenting the interplay between nature and people. She wants her students to observe more keenly, becoming closer to the world around then. A part-time resident of Granville in Central Vermont, she is attached to the wildlife in cities as much as in the country.

The Artists for Nature Foundation has already published two books meant to draw attention to threatened areas worldwide and to raise money for conservation. "Wind, Wad & Waterverf" focused on the Dutch barrier island of Schiermonikoog and "Portrait of a Living Marsh" brought attention to the Bierbrza marsh area in eastern Poland.

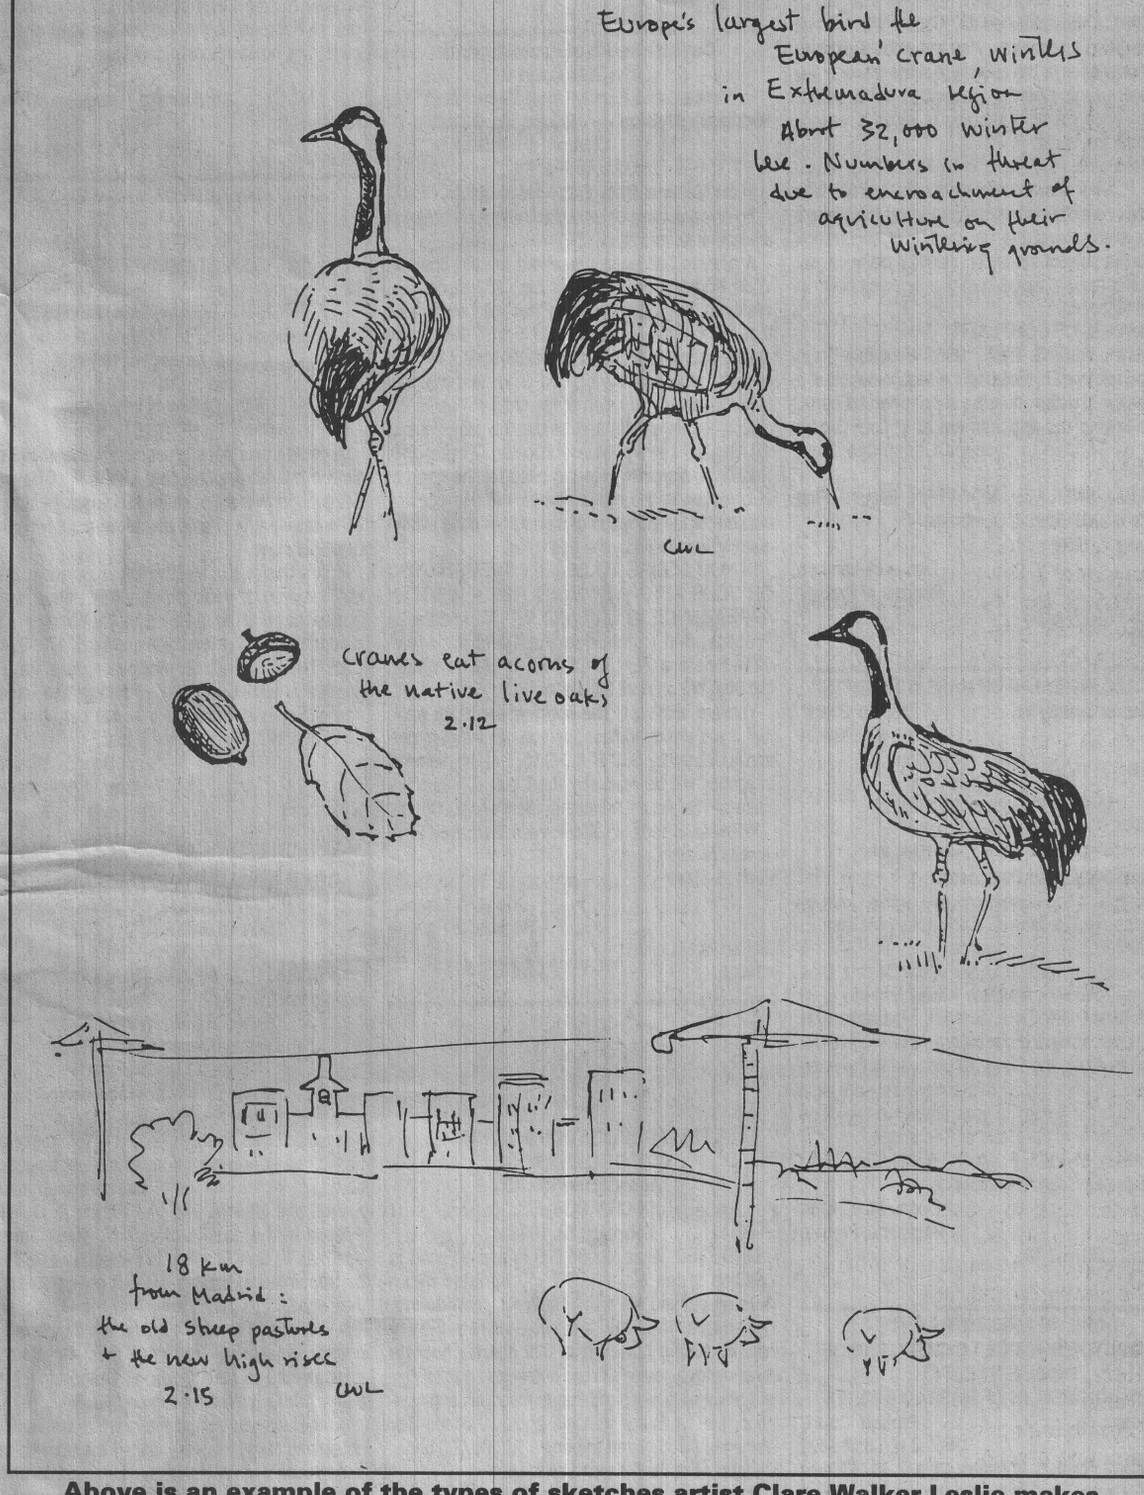

The foundation decided to follow the cranes because of their migratory habits that leave them depending on the habitats of many countries for survival. About 50,000 European cranes with wing spans of nearly 1.5 meters fly the 2,500 kilometers to Spain each year, moving through the Baltic states and from Poland across Germany and France to the Iberian peninsula where Extremadura is home for the winter.

During her own stay, Leslie combined her interest in the environment with a career challenge to produce some of her best work in water color, as well as pen and ink.

"It was very exciting for me professionally because the other artists are the best in their country," said Leslie. "They're nationally recognized so I had to produce my best."

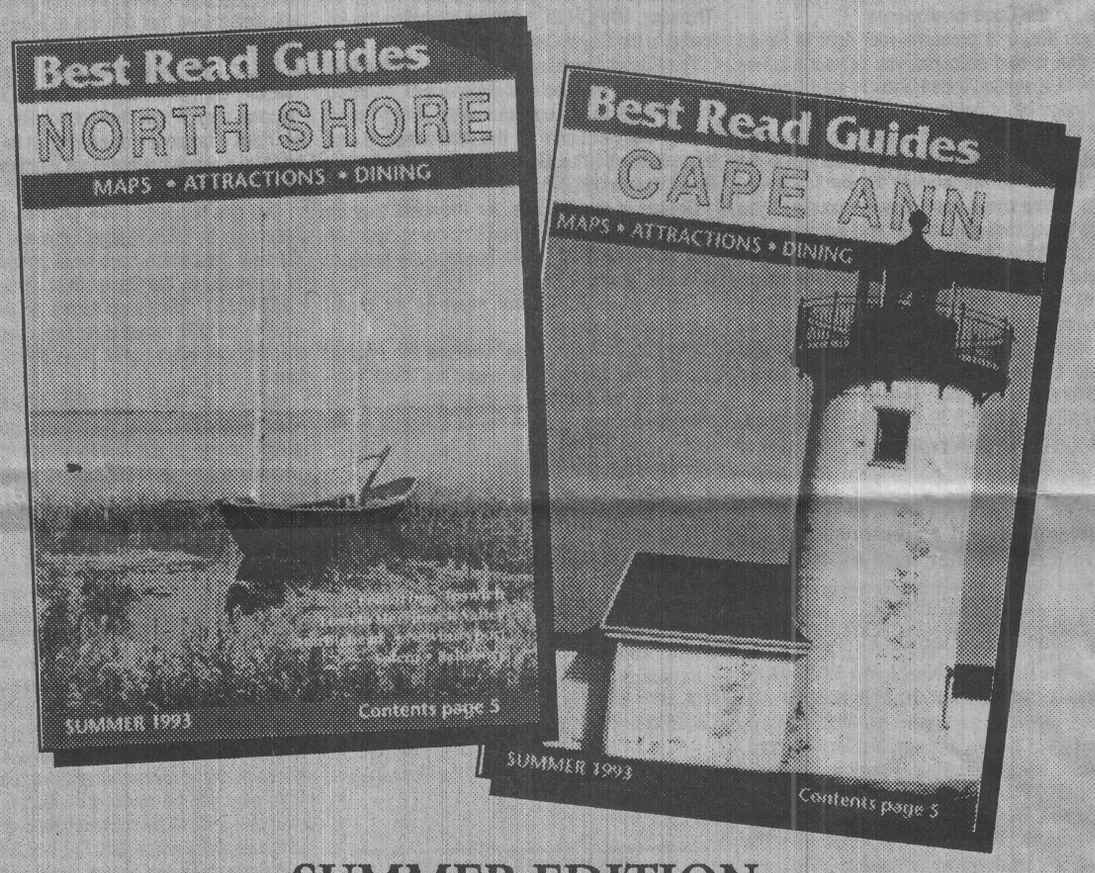

Local artist Clare Walker Leslie, who last month took part in an Artists for Nature Foundation trip to the Extremadura region of Spain, likes to be very aware of the interplay between nature and people.
