Dear members of the city council,

As a resident of Cambridge, England, I thought I would drop you a line to tell you that people in this city have been devastated by the terrorism attacks, and quite a few in this area have lost loved-ones who were working in the World Trade Centre.

You might like to know that English people have been approaching American strangers in the street or at work and offering them words of comfort or simply the chance to talk to a friend.

From one Cambridge to another, I wish you and the US my best wishes. It could easily have been us instead of you.

John Conlon
