LEGAL NOTICES

Cambridge Teachers Association president Susan Noonan-Forster has protested inclusion of a parent in contract negotiations by the school committee.

Adds Michael Dudgeon, the parent who was appointed by Weinstein and Cooper: "I don't foresee I or any other parent would want to disturb negotiations. But we think we're a viable, important participant."

Noonan-Forster claims the inclusion of one parent might open the way for many other participants in the negotiation process, which she says would slow down the process and threaten continuity in contract negotiations. More participants would also threaten the confidentiality of contract talks, she says.

"We want to get down to negotiating," says Noonan-Forster.

Cambridge Teachers Association president Susan Noonan-Forster has protested inclusion of a parent in contract negotiations by the school committee.

Adds Michael Dudgeon, the parent who was appointed by Weinstein and Cooper: "I don't foresee I or any other parent would want to disturb negotiations. But we think we're a viable, important participant."

Noonan-Forster claims the inclusion of one parent might open the way for many other participants in the negotiation process, which she says would slow down the process and threaten continuity in contract negotiations. More participants would also threaten the confidentiality of contract talks, she says.

"We want to get down to negotiating," says Noonan-Forster.

from previous page at the "black" window; how at Camp Oglethorpe in Georgia her unit was housed in a building with no hot water and "spiders as big as your hand jumping all around like toadfrogs."

"It's quite a thing, when you're trying to serve your country, the way they'll treat you," Oliver says. "... I didn't go so far from Virginia [where she was born] for someone to treat me like that."

Like Oliver, Dorothy Jones of Cambridge served in the WAAC "under the good old-fashioned racist system," she says. The two served in the 6888 Central Postal Directory unit, the only contingent of black women to serve overseas in World War II and — perhaps not a coincidence — the only overseas unit never to receive a citation honoring their work.

"It was my first taste of Southern life as the average [black] person would know it," Jones says. She also faced problems she terms "more sexism than racism" when she applied repeatedly for Officer Candidates School, and was repeatedly turned down. "I applied for everything," she recalls. But new candidates weren't accepted until trained officers had been placed. And since women officers were only assigned to army camps where the commanding officer requested them, she explains, "they had a pool of officers trained and sitting around with no place to go."

Both Jones and Oliver recall their time in Europe as a respite from the racial pressures they faced in the U.S. "Children would ask us, 'Is it true that in your own country they keep you people outdoors while they are eating?'" Oliver recalls. "And I said, 'Whatever you read, it's true.'"

It was a pleasure to know children who weren't running away like they're afraid of you."

By the time Perez entered the army in the 1950s, the army was nominally desegregated — but the South was not. To make matters worse, the army classified Perez — a brown-skinned woman — as "Caucasian." "That created a lot of confusion for me," she says.

In many ways, Perez says, she liked the army. "I loved drill," she says. "I loved the marches, I loved the Sousa music ... I liked the structure and the discipline, because living in poverty there's a certain amount of chaos."

She joined the service, she says, for "economic reasons" and to get away from her family. "I'm Hispanic; my mother was old-fashioned. It was either get married or go into a convent," she says. "But when I went South, it was culture shock ... The whole thing about segregation, the ability of people to humiliate people based on race, was new to me ... The way they'd say 'Porta Rican' — it made me think of Porta-Toilet or something."

Like many women vets, Perez argues that the Veterans Administration (VA) is "very male-oriented." Even the VA hospitals do not adequately serve women, she says: "For gynecological services, you have to be sent elsewhere ... You walk into the VA and it's so male — you don't even want to be there."

Jones cites her experience with the VA as an example of the agency's insensitivity to women. In late 1949, while going to school on the GI bill, she became pregnant and had to interrupt her studies. Though her pregnancy was unplanned, Jones says, the VA refused to extend her benefits the same way it would for male soldiers who were, "through no fault of their own," forced to interrupt their studies. Jones never finished her undergraduate studies.

"The VA is run by men for men, and it's not going to change until they have women in the administration," Jones says.

A current campaign to erect a memorial statue honoring women Vietnam-era veterans, Perez says, represents a critical step in recognizing the contribution of women veterans. For Oliver, that recognition is long overdue. "No matter what terrible conditions we faced in England or in France," she says, "it didn't beat the way it was right there in America. And there's still a long ways to go."

CITY OF CAMBRIDGE REQUEST FOR PROPOSAL

The City of Cambridge, acting through its Community Development Department, is seeking qualified consultants to perform analyses of the City's development regulations and housing market to determine (1) the means by which the City can encourage a greater portion of housing in the mix of future construction in its major development areas, and (2) the means by which a reasonable portion of that housing could be made affordable to families having a wide range of incomes.

Flynn proposes commission to review affirmative action compliance

By Susan Karwoska
Mayor Raymond

Flynn's proposal two weeks ago for a new city commission to monitor compliance with a Boston ordinance setting hiring quotas for Boston residents, minorities, and women has been greeted with mixed reactions from area businesses and community organizations.

At the annual meeting of the Urban League of Eastern Massachusetts, Flynn said that the city "needs to be accountable" in the effort to "provide people of all colors the opportunity for decent jobs and income." To review progress in this direction, Flynn announced, the city was establishing its first Boston Employment Commission.

"The economic growth of downtown Boston must reach and benefit the many people of Boston's neighborhoods who have been systematically left behind . . . in jobs, housing, education, and job training," said Flynn. "We have made good progress in this city but clearly more needs to be done."

Don Polk, president of the Urban League of Eastern Massachusetts, says the commission is necessary "to make sure the city, state, and to some extent private industry does not ignore those neighborhood residents left out of the jobs boom."

Polk adds that the Boston Resident Jobs Policy, established in 1979 by an executive order of then-mayor Kevin White to ensure that city-sponsored projects would hire city residents, would not be implemented as "clearly" as it could be without this new commission. "Flynn has shown a determination to . . . see that Bostonians in neighborhoods are not left behind," says Polk.

But a member of a committee Flynn created in 1984 to serve as a liaison between the community and business on the same issues says Flynn should be giving the existing committee more power to monitor compliance with the jobs policy instead of creating a new commission.

Chuck Turner — a member of the city-wide liaison committee made up of a city representative and representatives of developers, contractors, building trade unions, and the community — says, "Right now we are being used as a backboard against which the mayor's balls are bounced."

Turner argues that the establishment of the new commission will further weaken the liaison committee, which at this point is "just an advisory committee" with no power to enforce the jobs policy. "Everybody [on the committee] is frustrated with the lack of power," he adds.

The proposed commission would authorize a five-member body appointed by the mayor to not only monitor, but to make judgments and impose sanctions in construction employment — powers the existing liaison committee does not have. The new board would also work with major Boston employers and developers to set up voluntary hiring agreements, as well as oversee future Boston jobs policies.

Don Polk, president of the Urban League of Eastern Massachusetts, says the new commission created by Mayor Raymond Flynn is necessary "to make sure the city, state, and to some extent private industry does not ignore those neighborhood residents left out of the jobs boom."

Despite the 17-member liaison committee's unanimous vote at its April meeting to reject the ordinance creating the new commission and to incorporate the powers outlined for the commission into the liaison committee, says Turner, "the mayor decided to go ahead" with the ordinance "in its original form."

Brian Gilmore, director of legislative affairs for the Boston Chamber of Commerce, says he questions the effectiveness of establishing the new commission, and said he "would not be surprised" if his organization opposed the ordinance creating the new commission.

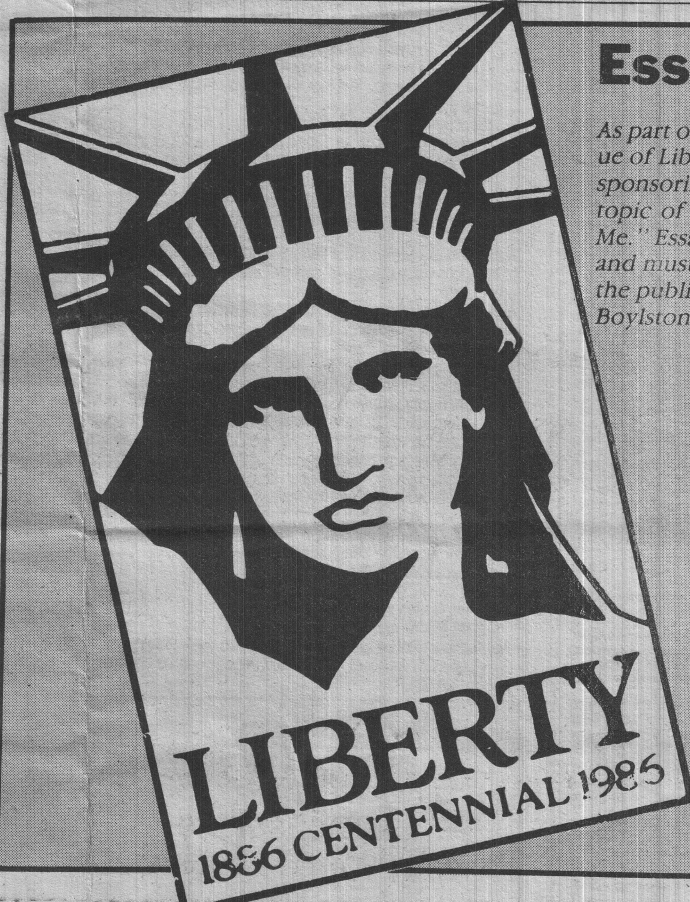

"Maybe he's got a brilliant rationale for it," says liaison committee member Tom Maher of the mayor's push for the new commission. "I just don't know. He's just restructuring everything, and what we would like to look at is are we maintaining the same enforcement."

Kristen McCormack, executive director of the mayor's Office of Jobs and Community Services, says the proposed ordinance was drafted in response to concerns raised last year by members of community groups and the building trades, and will provide "a comprehensive and systematic approach to implementing ordinances that already exist."

But Maher says, "Unless the employment commission takes into its form and substance the liaison committee, the liaison committee will feel that their power and authority will be seriously questioned." The two-year-old committee, he says, will be left with only "symbolic power."

Turner claims this is "typical of what we've experienced over the last 18 months, in that the committee is not treated seriously in the development and implementation of policy. Bypassing the liaison committee with the employment commission is just another piece in a familiar pattern."

The ordinance creating the new commission was submitted to the Boston City Council for approval two weeks ago, says McCormack, and must be approved by that body before it would take effect.
